Just after Christmas I turned on the radio almost without thinking. A programme called "A Bright Yellow Light" was being broadcast. It described an account of the terrifying event, three years ago, when Natasha Ednan-Laperouse suffered a severe allergic reaction to a sandwich whilst on an aeroplane. Despite being injected with copious doses of Epinephrine, as well as strenuous efforts to administer CPR, she became unconscious and tragically died. Her father Nadim and a friend were with her. The horror experienced by Natasha, as well as her family and friends, is unimaginable. As she lay dying, her father underwent a dramatic religious experience which was to change the lives of him, his wife Tanya and his family as well as many others. He describes what happened: "Just as it couldn't get worse, five angels just appeared, emanating a strong, soft yellow light, rather like candlelight but really intense and in great detail – these five figures like thin people just appeared with wings on their backs." He describes the light as something incredibly soothing and warm, but he told them that this was not her time. He then realised in a split second that her soul had been taken to a better place and that one day they would be reunited. No-one else saw these figures. Could this have been an hallucination at a moment of unimaginable stress? Given his background he was clearly the last person you would expect to have any sort of religious experience. To those who say “I don’t believe you” he simply answers by saying that he has nothing to gain by making it up.

At the time Nadim was an atheist with no interest in religions. But in the months afterwards he started going to church and came to feel there was a profound reason why these angels had appeared to him. He now feels that what really matters above all is faith and trust in God. As a result he and his wife threw themselves into helping create Natasha’s Law, to protect people with allergies. What are we to make of this Damascene moment? Angels are present in many religions; and as we were reminded recently, angels play a crucial part in the Christmas narrative. In Hebrews 13 verse 2 we are told to “Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; for thereby some have entertained angels unawares”. Perhaps they are an extreme manifestation of God’s presence.

Are we sometimes unaware of God’s presence in our lives? A former Abbot of St Benoit-sur-Loire once said that we are likely to pass God by without ever noticing him. But there are signs and wonders that he works in our lives if we take time to be still and listen; perhaps in the presence of others, or maybe when we are listening to prose, poetry or music; or when we meditate on Psalm 8 and “consider thy heavens, even the works of thy fingers; the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained”.

Nadim and his family still feel grief, but he says that “I am happy that I feel one with God. We have been to a very low place – it couldn’t get worse, and in that moment God lifted us and carried us forward to bring about massive, dramatic change to save people with food allergies from dying”.

In speaking of God, Thomas Merton tells us to “be attentive to the times of day: when the birds begin to sing and the deer come out of the morning fog. Every moment is God’s own good time. He is there all the time, and if we give him time, he will make himself known to us”.
